The Lounging Howloon

What a fabulous monster catcher I am! See I must be a genius! Whilst venturing further through the jungle, we stumbled upon a swamp. We would have frozen in fear if it had not been for the fact that we would have been consumed by the stinking swamp. Twizzle (our net keeper) was moving at the speed of light just to stay up on the same spot.

Anyway, back to our magnificent monster. We have called this creature the Lounging Howloon due to the fact that he is amazingly lazy. He is a red beast, who looks rather like a dragon. His scales are course and shiny, his teeth are sharp and pointy and my goodness, his breath is the most revolting thing I have ever had the misfortune of smelling, (its worse than the swamp).

At full height this creature is 10ft 3 inches and towers above us all. As we feared, he is a meat eater, who can usually be found tugging boa constrictors out of the tall trees and slurping them down like spaghetti. Fortunately for us, he does not seem to want to devour us at all, in fact he is more interested in our luggage than our flesh. This is much to our amusement, as he has taken the liking for Bounces' luggage in particular.

Following gentle luggage persuasion, we finally managed to coax the Howloon into the large packing crate. We may be a couple of items of clothing less, but it seems to have worked because the Howloon seemed to enjoy routing through our smalls!

We have placed a large number of stamps on the package and hope it makes it to the King in one piece. I must remember to include a warning letter for the King to read before opening the crate or he might end up ill, or worst still dead from toxic fumes.

Potts the genius!
